Title: Wonderment, Perplexity and the Inner Landscape of Learning

What does it mean to be on the "inside" of learning? Just who is the teacher, the student, the administrator involved in the enterprise of education? At a time when public discussion of education can leave educators dispirited, particularly as great pressure is placed upon standards and outcomes, it is crucial to rediscover the inner landscape of learning that connects all involved. This session will be devoted to this rediscovery by focusing on those basic human experiences that lie at the very heart of learning: wonderment and perplexity.

Brian D. Robinette, Ph.D.

He arrived at Saint Louis University in 2003 after completing his PhD at the University of Notre Dame. Prior to Notre Dame he studied theology at Saint John's University, Collegeville, Minnesota and English literature and philosophy at Belmont University, Nashville, Tennessee. His research activities to date have focused primarily on Christology, eschatology, and anthropology. His approach to the discipline of theology incorporates a broad spectrum of resources and methods, including phenomenology, hermeneutics, mimetic theory, and aesthetics.

Brian teaches courses from the freshmen to the graduate level at SLU. He received the teaching excellence award (2009), as well as a mentoring award (2006) from the College of Arts & Sciences. He also has served as the Undergraduate Program Director for the Department of Theological Studies. He and his wife, Krista, live in Webster Groves, Missouri with their two sons, Trevor and Austin.
